Julius Ferney In Far North

Julius Ferney, formerly of Walla Walla has gone far both in mileage and experience since he started work as a linotypist for the Walla Walla Union shortly before it combined with the Bulletin in 1934.

Ferney, son of Jesse Ferney who operates an old book store on West Main street attended Walla Walla high school. He now runs a tri-weekly paper at Sitka, Alaska.

When not playing in the school band here, he would be in his father's printing shop absorbing the fragrance of ink, and learning about the typesetting machines and presses.

Between time spent in this town and his Alaskan venture started last spring, Ferney worked for the Oregonian for a short period and then for the Seattle Post-Intelligencer.

Prior to taking over the Sitka Sentinel, he ran a neighborhood weekly at Richland Beach near Everett.

Ferney finds everywhere he goes that people consider the same sort of news interesting. Copies of the Sentinel, sent to the elder Ferney, show that Alaskans like to follow the world series, electioneering, scores of local team games, and the fishing and lumbering industries which help to support the town.

The as show that people of Alaska think of traveling primarily in terms of boats and planes. They also follow reports of hunters getting lost.
