Notes for HARRY L JR YOST:

Opposition to Licensing Idaho Drivers

Harry L. Yost, senator of Ada County, introduced the bill, but was met by sizable opposition. The biggest was the Idaho Statesman. The Statesman feared that starting a driver's licensing program would not help save lives but would instead be the beginnings of a costly bureaucracy that would require additional manpower and additional duties for the sheriffs at an additional cost ($1 for three years).

But the persistent efforts of license proponents paid off. What turned out to be one of the most time consuming debates on the Senate floor, resulted in the Driver's License Law by July 1, 1935. Valid for three years, each license cost motorists only 50 cents.

From that point on, more laws were set in place to protect the safety of those who took to the roads. The Motor Vehicle Safety Act, also known as the Financial Responsibility Law, came into play in 1947.

This ultimately lead to the creation of The Financial Responsibility Section, which was part of a movement to suspend the driving privileges of motorists who did not heed the provisions of the act. In addition, laws came into play by 1953 that required motorists to prove financial responsibility when convicted of certain violations.

By 1965, the cost of a driver's license went up to $6 and featured a photo of the license holder. And within a couple of years, the Driver Improvement Section was beefed up with a number of new programs designed to place the responsibility for revoking all driving privileges under one section.
